Kosanji Temple Museum(Miraishin no Oka)

The Choseizan Kosanji is a temple which belongs to the Honganji School of the Jodo-Shinshu Sect of Buddhism. It was built by Priest Kosanji Kozo, who entered the priesthood after his mother's death to pray for the repose of her soul. The construction of the numerous halls and towers started in 1936 and took more than 30 years to finish. The buildings adopt typical styles and techniques of Buddhist architectures from Asuka, Nara, Kamakura, and Edo periods. Upon entering the main gate built in the same style as that of the Shishinden Hall of the Kyoto Imperial Palace, you will see an inner gate reminiscent of a two-story gate at Horyuji Temple in Nara, a pathway then leads to the Rakando Hall with the 500 Rakan Buddhist statues placed inside and to the prayer hall which fully represents the architectural beauty of Momoyama period.

Spreading on a small hill in the precincts of Kosanji Temple Museum is an environmental design site called Miraishin no Oka (Hill of Hope), which was created with marble by internationally famous sculptor Kazuto Kuetani. The harmony of the white Italian marble and the blue of the Seto Inland Sea will gently comfort the visitors.

Kojoji Temple itself was built in 1403, while the three-story pagoda was built in 1432, both in the Muromachi period. Amazing carvings on the wooden eaves and jointed beams make this a piece of spectacular architecture. It also employs various unusual techniques, including the inverted lotus-flower decorations on the main pillars of the four corners of each story.

Setodacho National Park Kannonyama is 472 meters above sea level. The highest peak of the Geiyo Islands and the islanders call it Mt. Fire Taki.

It is said that it got its name long ago from the fact that it raised a "noroshi", or smoke signal, as a means of communication for ship traffic. The scenery from the top of the mountain is the best in the Seto Inland Sea, and you can see the Shikoku peaks and the Chugoku Mountains. A large panorama of the Geiyo Islands spreads out before you.
